LIGHT SHOWERS.

By Hal E. Roach.

Snub and his wife are bitten by the Suburban Bug. After a long search they finally choose a delightful bungalow situationed on a filled-in streeted. Having much faith in the agent who sold them the house, they gave scant heed to the shower that started shortly after a few days of their occupancy. With the steady downpour the cellar, the front yard and even the parlor floor was soon invaded by the rush of waters. All that transpires in their efforts to receive friends, getting meals and continue their daily occupations are shown in mirth provoking situations and the last view we have of them is their climbing ^{oatlike} to the mantel-piece in the parlor to finish their night's repose and keep above the fast rising waters.
